ABSTRACT

Results of the Indiana TIME (Teacher Initiated Materials Evaluation) Project are presented to assist teachers and administrators with instructional materials selection. Teachers were surveyed about materials they owned, used on a daily basis, and believed effective. The resulting guide is separated into the following sections (title and publisher presented for subheadings under each): preschool handicapped; educable mentally retarded (EMR) primary; EMR intermediate; EMR junior high; EMR senior high; trainable mentally retarded (TMR) primary to intermediate; TMR junior and senior high; severely/profoundly retarded; speech, hearing, and language handicapped; emotionally handicapped; learning disabled (LD) primary and intermediate; LD junior and senior high; deaf and hearing impaired; blind and visually impaired; physically handicapped; and multiply handicapped. INTRODUCTION

Which special materials are effective? Which special education materials have my peers found effective? Which materials are worthy of further investigation? The Educators' Guide to Effective Special Education Materials will help answer these questions. The contents of the Educators' Guide were obtained through the Indiana TIME (Teacher-Initiated Materials Evaluation) Project which is described below.

Budget restrictions, demands for increased accountability, and sound educational practice demand that only high-quality materials be selected and purchased. These demands will be more pronounced as economic constraints further restrict materials acquisitions. The purpose of this publication is to guide teachers and administrators to those materials which have been found to be effective in educating handicapped children. All items listed are items which teachers own, use on a daily basis, and have reported as effective with exceptional children. This publication should, however, be considered only as a starting point, an aid in the selection of special materials.

Project Design

Many instructional materials evaluation efforts have been undertaken. However, few have proven successful on a large scale. An accepted evaluation design often includes committees which examine and evaluate materials. Time constraints, lack of real field test conditions, and the limited number of items which a committee can effectively evaluate often limit the materials evaluation results.

The Indiana TIME Project is different from other efforts in that teachers are asked to report on materials which they own, use on a daily basis, and believe so effective, that others in similar situations should consider them for use. A further and most useful feature of the Indiana TIME Project is the fact that our office can contact the owner-user-respondent for each item listed. This feature is essential, allowing those needing specific information to obtain that first-hand instructional data that only an actual user can provide.

The procedures used to gather and report information were as follows:

* Reporting forms were developed, utilizing a postcard format. Teachers were asked to list the title, publisher, and recommended curricular area of the two most effective materials used. Respondents were also asked to identify themselves and the recommended exceptionality area(s) and grade level for the reported items.

* Reporting forms were sent to all Indiana Directors of Special Education.

* Reporting forms were distributed to teaching staffs for completion.

* Completed reporting forms were returned to our office.

* Information was processed and printed in the Educators' Guide; copies were disseminated to all Directors and to all teacher-respondents.

Special Features of the Indiana TIME Project

The Indiana TIME Project is a unique method of evaluating and reporting on effective materials in that:

* Teachers report on materials which have been purchased and used on a daily basis.

* Teachers may report on any materials found effective, regardless of media type.

* The possibility of "loaded" sampling techniques is reduced, as teachers may report on any effective materials.

* Reporting forms are brief and concise to facilitate rapid completion by large numbers of teachers.

* Our office can put in direct contact those teachers requesting information about a certain program with those teachers actually using the program on a daily basis.

Using the Educators' Guide to Effective Special Education Materials

The Educators' Guide should be consulted whenever materials acquisitions are being considered. It represents the collective input of hundreds of special teachers and thousands of years of collective classroom teaching experience.

The contents of the Educators' Guide are separated into various exceptionality areas (EMR, TMR, LD, etc.) and, where appropriate, by level (primary, intermediate, etc.) and curricular area (math, reading, etc.). Thus, to determine which materials have been reported as being effective for the teaching of reading to primary EMR students, one would locate the EMR Primary section and then locate the Reading/Reading Readiness section of this category.

Materials are listed by title and publisher. A directory of selected publishers is also included as part of this project report.

Many materials will have a number in parentheses following the title. This is a frequency count of how many times the material was reported. Materials reported one time have no number following the title.

Final Comment

Nearly 500 teachers and administrators contributed their time and expertise toward this effort. Without their assistance, this project would have been impossible. We wish to thank all who contributed to the successful completion of this project.

Comments concerning the effectiveness, utilization, or desired changes are most welcome. Correspondence should be addressed to:
